

April 25, 2013

It has been represented in the press that the FCC is considering relaxing the language and nudity standards for network television. The home is the only safe haven left in this country from coarse and objectionable language and dress. The only way I can block the airwaves from network television coming into my home is to have no receiving devices thus cutting me off from what is happening in my community and the world. The standards of decency are already low enough. I beseech of you not to lower them any further.

Sincerely,
William A. Schaefermeyer